

FORECLOSURES.

Appraisers technically shouldn't consider neighborhood foreclosures when valuing a home, since foreclosures don't meet the Appraisal Institute's definition of a property reasonably exposed in a competitive market, says Herndon. "But when several neighborhood homes are abandoned, it's hard not to caution sellers that this is a troubling trend and may affect home values," she says.